ALUMNI SPOTLIGHT

From TV Production at Archbishop Hannan to NCIS: New Orleans Script Coordinator, Cameron Dupuy (Class of 2012) is making his dreams come true in the television industry.

Cameron began writing at a young age. "I've been putting pen to paper (via computer, of course) since I was ten or so," he said. "I've always loved telling stories." Being a Hannan student helped foster Cameron's creativity. He learned filmmaking and technique in Mr. Rodriguez's TV Production class where he was able to write and produce several short films. "Being a student at Hannan impacted me in a lot of ways. The biggest was that it provided me an environment to create and tell stories that was always open and never judgemental. I always felt empowered to do my own thing creatively."

One of Cameron's favorite memories from Archbishop Hannan was getting to be an anchor on the very first episode of Hawk Talk. "It was such a cool moment for myself and for the school in general," he said. "Hannan allowed me some great opportunities to gain more confidence in my abilities to communicate and talk to large groups effectively. So much of my job (and what will eventually be my career) is pitching ideas. So communication and confidence are really important."

Following high school, Cameron attended the University of New Orleans and started as an intern on NCIS: New Orleans during his senior year of college. "I eventually worked my way from production to the writer's room in California," he said. "I interned for a year then moved to California a week after graduation and started as a Writers P.A." The following year he became a Script Coordinator for the series and recently co-wrote his first episode set to air on March 5th.

Cameron's future goals include being staffed fulltime on a television show, eventually becoming a showrunner, and ideally directing one day. "Being able to do something that's rewarding, both personally and professionally, is a gift."

Be sure to watch NCIS: New Orleans on March 5th to see Cameron's episode. The series airs Tuesdays on CBS at 10pm / 9pm central.
