Students are studying examples of social commentary in literature (short stories, a novel, comics), and will create their own work which comments on a social injustice they see in their world.

Driving Question
How can we create projects that comment on and ignite change in society?

Dispositions

Resources
Student interviewed “experts”, Observed students from Cottle School, Interviewed other Students in other Countries

Products & Formative Assessments
Students used their knowledge of social commentary to create their own short, creative piece of social commentary. They chose a social injustice that they see in their world and created a project with the goal of opening people’s eyes to the issue.

Success Skills
Creativity
Critical Thinking

Assessment of Success Skill
Self reflection answering the questions:
What did I learn? How have I changed?
Large group discussion based on self reflections.

Students will read various works which are examples of social commentary. We will read a novel together (Dickens’ A Christmas Carol) and explore what was happening in Victorian England during Dickens’ time that made him so angry and how did he use his book to try to bring about change. We will also briefly talk about literature that we read previously in English and question whether they are examples of social commentary (Wrinkle in Time, 12 Angry Men, The Outsiders). Students will then read/view a variety of social commentary (short stories, comics, excerpts from graphic novels, artwork, music, etc.) and look at how these works may be examples of social commentary. Students will eventually create their own project which comments on something happening in society.
