

Service Learning: From Ideas to Action

Led by Cathryn Berger Kaye, M.A.

Moving from ideas to purposeful action: this is the heart of service learning. All educators seek ways to add depth and meaning to learning, and strategies that will guide students to understand the dense and complex issues facing our communities. This can best be accomplished by extending academic connections beyond the confines of the classroom through a reliable and effective process: service learning.

Participate in a dynamic interchange and engaging experiences as together we explore how service learning builds the capacity for students to:

- Conduct social analysis through action research—a method applicable to every research assignment
- Authenticate community assets and needs—increase the ability to make local and global connections
- Elevate question asking skills—a transferable ability that augments all learning
- Create sustainable reciprocal partnerships—develop understanding of the importance of clarifying roles and responsibilities and meeting personal and group obligations
- Reflect by choice on significant moments and learning—and enjoy the process of reflection
- Demonstrate what has been learned, the process of learning, and what has been accomplished through service—resulting in a more astute and competent learner

Through a vivid articulation of the five stages of service learning, you will be more able to strengthen everyday teaching as well as the capstone moments that occur throughout the school years. We will also explore curriculum planning for academic integration that aims for interdisciplinary connections, possible at all grade levels. Additional pathways for service learning will include experiences with travel and advisory, and other areas as presented by participants.

These two days are designed for educators in grades K-12 to provide practical strategies you can use immediately. Whether you are a service learning novice or bring years of experience, this institute is for you!

Handouts are included. Cathryn's book The Complete Guide to Service Learning will also be referenced; bring your copy if you have one. Come ready to participate.
