Beginning today, all Austin Seminary classes are being moved to an on-line format for the remainder of the spring semester. Faculty are contacting students in their courses to inform them about course expectations for the remainder of the academic term. We are moving to this on-line format in order to do our part to prevent further spread of the coronavirus. Our faculty, IT staff, and learning technologies librarian, Mandy Deen, have been working overtime to ensure that the transition to this format is as smooth as possible. There will be some hiccups along the way, but I am committed to maintaining a productive learning environment as we move forward. And I am very proud of our faculty, staff, students, and administration as we address educational needs during this unprecedented time. Thank you all for your continued work, service, and study in this place. Please pray for our hurting world and do what you can to meet the astonishing needs of this moment. For all of us, this means maintaining appropriate social distancing practices and following the guidelines of our national, state, and local governments. Please let me know of any questions you have as we move to on-line teaching today.

In prayer, Dave Jensen
