Why study History A' level

- ▶ History helps you develop a range of valuable skills...
 - the ability to develop your own hypotheses and interpretations.
 - high level communication skills, both written and verbal.
 - the ability to critically evaluate the ideas and interpretations of others.
 - to be able to confidently analyse a range of sources and use these to support or reject an historical argument.
 - to develop a sense of empathy.
 - to be able to recognise, comment on and explain change and continuity over time.

Why study History A' level

- ▶ It is a very well respected subject, by employers and Universities.
 - People who have studied History can organise their time and work load effectively.
 - History students can gather information from a range of sources, collate and organise it, synthesise the information and present their key findings effectively.
 - History students are used to writing and communicating at a high level.
 - People with an understanding of History can recognise change and continuity over time, and can use their understanding of past events to inform their decisions in the present.
 - History students work very effectively independently, but can also be valuable members of a team.
 - History students can appreciate a range of opinions, evaluate the strengths and weaknesses of different arguments and then decide on the best option. They will be able to support their decisions with relevant evidence / reasons.

...will help you achieve your potential. You will develop skills in analysis, argument and communication, to name a few.

...is exciting and interesting. It develops a real love of history to take with you into later life.

History at Southam College...

...requires commitment. It is important to be organised and keep up with deadlines to keep making progress.

...is hard work. It is a heavy reading subject and you will be required to take on extra reading in your own time. We will have high expectations of you!

...is really rewarding – you will develop so much knowledge and understanding over the course. You will be really proud of your achievements at the end!
