Helping Our Children Meet Their Social Needs When Socializing Must Be Distanced
A Conversation with Robin Walker, LMFT

Whether we are parenting Kindergarten students or High School age, understanding how to support our children's social and emotional development during a pandemic can feel elusive.

What types of interactions and experiences do our kids need and how do we provide them when traditional playdates, connections in the school hallway, and regular group activities are sidelined? To what extent can digital interactions help meet these needs?

A special thanks to all the Viewpoint parents who submitted their questions. They will be incorporated into the conversation with Robin Walker, LMFT as we discuss the issues that matter most to our parent community.

A child and family therapist for over 30 years, Robin Walker has dedicated his professional life to exploring the experiences that help young people grow and change into productive and caring adults. Along the way, he has helped parents facilitate conversations and experiences to support their children. Robin has trained countless therapists in their work with children and teens, and has served as President for the Los Angeles chapter of the California Association for Play Therapy. He has also been tapped as a parenting expert for national publications like Parenting magazine and the Los Angeles Times.
