Rethinking How We Celebrate American History —Indigenous Peoples' Day

Happy Indigenous Peoples' Day! On Monday, more states, cities, and communities than ever observe Indigenous Peoples' Day in place of or in addition to Columbus Day. They're part of a larger movement to see a more complete and accurate history of the United States taught in our schools and public spaces. Given research showing that the majority of state and local curriculum standards end their study of Native American history before 1900, the importance of celebrating the survival and contemporary experience of Native peoples has never been clearer.

The resolution to change the name of Columbus Day stems from efforts that began in the 1970s by members of the American Indian Movement. Indigenous Peoples' Day celebrates the many native tribes of the United States, and recognizes the fact that Columbus was not a hero to the native people, whom he sought to enslave upon his arrival.
