A dusky violet plum
the tree’s remaining one thin-skinned and tender as a pupil of an eye that in the dew at night dispelled love, visions, disquietude, and with the morning-star the dew more buoyant grew – That’s poetry. Touch it so -- not letting the trace of your finger show.

From In the Sinai Desert, 1954