A NOTE FROM THE PRINCIPAL

Bobbi A. Anderson-Hume, Ph.D.

Are you ready for more chit chat about behavior and grading? Yes! I feel your excitement! I have said this before, the purpose of grades is to communicate to students and parents/guardians what students know and can do in regard to a standard (e.g. convert between fractions and decimals). That's it. Honestly, most of what was done for your and my grading when we were in school wasn't overly accurate and reliable. I'm not throwing shade at my predecessors, we all do the best we can with what we know at the time. And, we didn't use grading then the way we do now. Now, we are constantly in search of precise and timely information to be used to determine what our students know and can do so that we can intervene if they don't know something, or give them something more if they do.

One of the most important parts of this process is to be clear about what the expectations are. In other words, we need to tell students what we are expecting them to learn or be able to do, and at what level. To do this, we use something called a rubric. In a perfect world, everything we ask kids to do would be on a rubric and first presented to kids, second used by teachers to assess how students are performing, and third given back to students and parents/guardians for feedback. Rubrics take a tremendous amount of training and time to write, especially across grades and subjects. Writing them across a building is a tremendous task, and this is what we have been doing with our professional development time.

I will be scheduling parent meetings to have you here to talk through all of these things in person later this year; my goal in my weekly bulletins is to provide pieces to think about in advance. We have started our work creating rubrics with behavior, and we are really excited about this work. First of all, it's building-wide work that creates building-wide expectations for all of the adults. Second, it's creating clear expectations for our students in advance, in print, for their constant reference. Not only are these types of proactive measures pure gold for school culture, it keeps behavior incidents lower in general. Third, you have heard me say multiple times that our kids have forgotten many of their school skills, this is an important piece of our plan for re-teaching, practicing, and getting these skills back for our kids. We began our work with kids this week Tuesday; ask your student what they learned! Fourth, having behavior rubrics will provide us with excellent longitudinal behavioral data about our students over 4 years of an important developmental period of their lives, as they head to high school. Think about what this will tell you and us (and the RHS staff) about their readiness and what they need to be ready! Fifth, (because a big part of my job is being the educational leader of this building) this is excellent practice for my staff who must be able to write rubrics for their own academic standards. Sixth, these curricular documents are essential for the District to have on hand for both our magnet school status and our overall academic success. Once these documents exist, they can be consistently improved upon and we hold ourselves to higher and higher standards.

Speaking of higher standards, I want to include our first draft of our first behavior standard for you to view. It has already been adjusted about six times this week. I want your feedback. I want to know how you feel about what is on it and our word choices. These are your kids and we are your school, please email me or call if you have opinions either way. It is a 0-8 point scale. Basically, a 0 means we do not see the skill, ever. An 8 means the student should be on a poster for the Department of Education modeling the skill. Our goal is for students to be 5s and 6s. Much more to come on this! Thank you!

Self Care

DEVELOPING A SELF-CARE PLAN

Self-care is any activity that we do deliberately to take care of our mental, emotional, and physical health. Knowing what self-care is not is also important. It is not something we force ourselves to do, or something we do not enjoy doing. Self-care should be something that refuels us rather than takes from us. It is not a selfish act either; it is not about only considering our needs, but about knowing what we need to do to take care of ourselves so we can perform better at work and take better care of others.

Assess your current level of self-care: You can start this by looking at your typical week and taking note of how many, if any, times you have taken some time for yourself. Pay attention to the types of activities you take part in. Make sure to give yourself credit for smaller actions as well, such as taking time to get your favorite coffee or watching a favorite TV show. It is also important to notice if there is an absence of self-care in your routines. Without self care, you are at higher risk for burnout. Developing a baseline for your self-care activities will help you to be aware of the importance of introducing these activities into your busy schedule.

Find out what you like to do: Once you have determined a baseline for your self-care activities, the next step may be to do some self-exploration. You will need to identify your personal interests and activities that are most enjoyable for you. Consider activities for your physical, mental, spiritual health, and relationships. You may also want to use your self-care time to try new things.

Integrate your self-care plan into your daily life: It is beneficial to develop a realistic self-care plan that you can commit to on a consistent basis. You should aim for incorporating a self-care activity at least once a week. For some, it may be helpful to actually schedule your self-care activities on your calendar each week. For others, using self-care activities as rewards or incentives may work better. You should start incorporating these activities slowly and build up to a schedule that best fits your lifestyle by making small changes. Making small changes and setting easily attainable goals will help you to create a more realistic path to implementing your self-care plan. It is important not to create more stress for yourself with your self-care goals.

Monitor your progress & adjust if necessary: After a few weeks, it will be important to monitor the success of your self-care plan. You should look at whether you are able to fulfill responsibilities without feeling burnt out and whether your plan has been successful in helping you achieve more balance in your life. If you feel you are losing motivation to follow through with your self-care plan, try new approaches or activities. Consider any obstacles that have come up and what is working well.

Adjust your self-care as needed and re-assess again in a few weeks.

SOCIAL STUDIES

The 5th graders have been working extremely hard on creating their Explorer Books in Social Studies! They learned about 14 different explorers that played an important roll during the Age of Exploration, and recorded their findings in their books. They also illustrated each page, and included information about the author.

READING

Fifth grade Language Arts students have been very busy in class. Before wrapping up the text feature unit, students completed a "Find It...Check It!" activity. Students paired up and chose a nonfiction book. Then they were given text features to search and find in the book. When finding the text feature, students checked it off and provided page evidence of their findings. Second hour students have been very busy with their vocabulary words. They have recently played "Vocabulary Freeze Frame." In this activity, students are in groups and given a vocabulary word to create a frozen picture depicting the word's definition. One student sits out of the group and then after entering the classroom, finds himself/herself among these frozen "frames" around the room, all showcasing one vocabulary word. The one student must identify the vocabulary word that all groups are displaying. Another activity this same group did in order to review for the upcoming vocabulary test, was to play "Pictionary/Charades." Students chose to draw on the Active Board for other classmates to figure out the necessary vocabulary words. Recently, most students have begun their Big Cat unit and will be learning and reading about the 7 largest big cats in the wild.

LANGUAGE ARTS

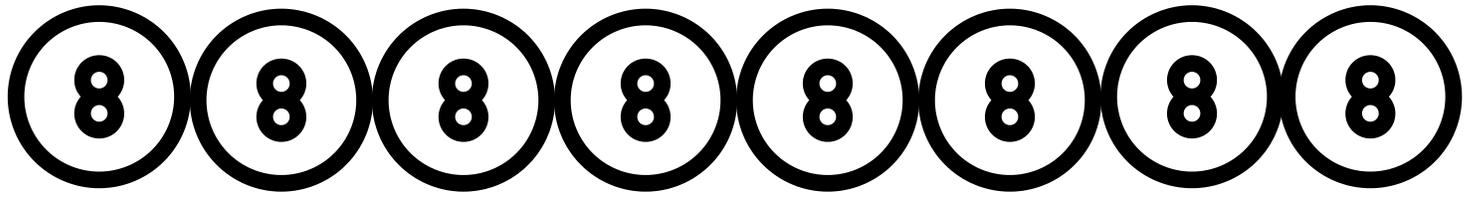

inspire

This week we read the children's book, "One Word for Kids," by Jon Gordon, Dan Britton and Jimmy Page. If you could choose only one word to help you have your best year, what would it be? It's probably different for everyone! Students brainstormed an amazing list of character traits and other words to help them discover what their own "one word" might be. We finished this activity by creating a classroom collage of one word art that will be placed out in the hallway to help encourage and inspire others.

Next, students began reading "Front Desk," a novel by Kelly Yang. We will be using this realistic fictional story to examine how authors use methods of characterization to create and bring to life the characters in their stories. We are also beginning to learn more about narrators and point of view in literature. We will be using the novel Front Desk for the next few weeks.

LANGUAGE ARTS

Before Christmas Break and in preparing to study Catherine Applegate's Home of the Brave, a novel written in Free Verse, 8th graders studied Free Verse poetry. With an emphasis on word choice, line formation, and figurative language, poets drafted, edited, and revised an original poem. So many writers created beautiful poems full of imagery by showing vs. telling within their work.

A few selections are below

Football, by Jet Gish

Getting ready in the locker room, stepping onto the field...
crowd yelling and cheering
echoing through the stadium.
Players strapping on their helmets and tying the cleats.
lights happily shine on the field like the sun.
Warming up, getting ready for our big game.
Going over the plays we've practiced just for this moment.
Breaking the huddle,
lining up for the big play.
Now it is showtime!

Summer's Death by Olivy Yonak

*I step outside.
A surprise awaits earth. Trees covered
In a blanket of snow.
Once green, brown and blue,
Now wears a sparkly coat.
Yesterday,
The sun sang a song of growth.
Today, it's muffled by the shrieking wind.
Behind the trees,
Summer's memory lingers.*

Seasons by Hailey Henrich

Winter's breath breezing over the land.
It snows like it
cries in spring.
Spring comes over to warm it up a bit.
Storms happen
as much as people shop.
Summer comes rolling over, ready to heat the Place up.
It's as hot as the center of the earth.
A perfect time
for a popsicle.
Then fall washes
over summer.
The heat cools,
the leaves fall,
and the allergies come.
Winter finally wakes up.
Everything starts freezing over.
Sadness returns.
This continuous cycle,
never truly ending.

Lemonade by Wil Bemah Lemonade...
Screams summer.
Yellow color bright.
Sour make you do a sour face – sweet!
Makes you smile.
Quenching ice to cool you down.
Ball bouncing on the blacktop.
Kids running to the stand.

Tea Party by Ainsley Gill

I look around to see happiness shining through everyone's eyes like rays of golden sun.
Absorbing the feeling,
spreading like a wildfire in the room.
Tea without sugar?
Scrunching my face,
bitterness fills my mouth,
leaving a lingering dryness.
I barely swallow.
"Pass the sugar please."
My eyes wander to the kitchen.
Mom boils more tea.
Bubbles rise quickly to take a breath.
Spoonfuls of sugar crystals fall in the white, polka-dotted tea cup.
Ladybug cup reaches my mouth.
Gone with one

This week, we began reading the novel and throughout our study of the book, we will analyze the use of Figurative Language, Symbolism, and Theme. The main character of the book, Kek, is a boy who leaves a refugee camp in Sudan and resettles in Minnesota – in December! In Part I, students interpreted Kek’s “Poetic Phrases” for both the literal and figurative meanings and are discovering the challenges of learning a new culture and a language. As the plot continues to develop in Part II, we will learn how Kek views this winter world and maintains hope that his mama is alive.
