The External Developmental Assets Tips for building these assets

Creating a strong foundation in a young person's life doesn't have to be difficult or overwhelming. Taking time, remaining patient, and giving a whole lot of love and caring will take you far. For most young people, their family is the center of their lives. Show your children you love them, and also value each one of them as individuals. Clearly communicate to one another your family's values, boundaries, and expectations (we well as those of the community). Give young people the appropriate amount of freedom to make their own decisions depending on their ages, but also offer options along the way.

Also try this...

In your home and family: Ask your children to name a few people who support them. If they don't name at least three adults, invite some of the adults you know and trust to get involved in your children's lives.

In your neighborhood and community: Advocate that your community develop meaningful opportunities for young people, such as creative youth programs or service projects.

In your school or youth program: Make a point to smile at every young person you see and let them know that you expect them to always do their best. Acknowledge their achievements and help them when they're struggling.
