The Basics: The Socially & Emotionally Intelligent Parent

There is no doubt that there are many variables that are outside of our control as parents and guardians. There are countless curveballs that come our way. There are certain dynamics that are within our control, namely our attitude and disposition and the way that we choose to respond to our kids. Working hard to be socially and emotionally intelligent as a parent/guardian has the ability to change so much of what we experience. In this seminar, we will talk about being self-aware, how to manage our own behaviors, how we view others, most importantly our kids and how to effectively manage our relationship with them. Healthy parents/guardians not only seek to maximize their social/emotional intelligence, but also model healthy behaviors for our kids.

The following session(s) are available online or at specified locations

Confronting and Managing the Mental Health Crisis

Our awareness of mental health as a nation continues to grow. We are living in a mental health tsunami that continues to impact every aspect of our lives whether directly or indirectly. Mental health is no longer a conversation that can be put in the closet as we hope that it will disappear and resolve itself. Parents and guardians are now confronted with needing to offer support and care for their children in the midst of their emotional and psychological health concerns.

Managing Conflict with Our Kids

Conflict is a normal, natural and inevitable dynamic of all human relationships especially with our kids. Each person not only views the world differently, but they also bring with them their own baggage that has the ability to create opportunities for conflict to occur. In addition to all of this, the ongoing stressors that we continue to experience in our world have the ability to increase the propensity for conflict. We explore: why conflict occurs, different types of conflict and how to manage and work through conflict effectively
