

Non-food Alternatives

for School Rewards and Fundraising

How NOT to use food in your school

1 Incentives, rewards or celebrations

Presenting food (both sweet and non-sweet) as a reward significantly enhances the desire for that food. Holiday celebrations, for example, could focus on traditional activities or games.

2 Punishment

Withholding food (usually candy or other low-nutritive value foods) as a punishment reinforces the desire for that food—just as if it were used as a reward.

3 Fundraising to support school programs

Food fundraisers may help the financial health of school activities—but at the expense of children's physical health.

→ Students learn from ALL their school experiences.

The goal is to create an environment that supports the healthy nutrition messages being taught in the classroom. Giving some groups (school staff or seniors) food options that aren't available to the whole student body sets up a double standard.

School food choices are not limited to lunches and vending machines.

The Institute of Medicine (IOM) Nutrition Standards for Food in Schools are suggested as voluntary guidelines and primarily affect school a la carte and vending choices. But those are not the only school food practices that contribute to childhood obesity. The IOM also recommends applying the nutrition standards to classroom parties and celebrations plus fundraising, rewards, and incentives for students. In addition, non-food alternatives may provide double benefits by limiting high calorie snacks AND increasing physical activity.
