Square Rectangle Triangle Circle Squiggle

Square Convergent Thinker

A Square feels most comfortable with a stable environment and clear directions on what to do. A square is conservative and likes things that are regular and orderly. If given a chance, a square will work on a job until it is finished, even if it is repetitious, cumbersome and lonely.

The Square, Rectangle and Triangle are all convergent. They are working towards something specific and finite, and they do it in a logical and systematic way. But they might be lacking in personal creativity.

If you really need something specific done, the Square is the most likely to do it exactly as specified. Squares will work well in the accounting department.

A Square will need fairly specific instructions. Squares will not be happy just floating around, not knowing where things are going. A Square will feel good about being presented with a technique and carrying it through until it is done. It doesn't matter much if it is repetitious, regularity is a source of comfort. For a Square it is a good idea to have more of a formal routine, certain rituals that are repeated.

choice to see what other side you have to your character.

Rectangle Convergent Thinker

A Rectangle likes structure and regularity. But she/he will establish it with organization, meetings, committees and so forth. This will have to be done the proper way, taking all rules and regulations into consideration. If given a task she/he will start organizing to be sure it can be done the most systematic way.

The Rectangle is a convergent thinker working towards something specific and finite, and the rectangle does things in a logical and systematic way. But rectangles might be lacking in personal creativity.

If things need to be organized amongst a group of people, then the Rectangle is most likely to make that happen.

A Rectangle needs to see how things are organized. A Rectangle needs to make a systematic overview and will probably also enjoy understanding the principles of a situation. A Rectangle is comfortable knowing and noticing that systematic techniques are being used and that he/she is in control.

If rectangle was your first choice go back and click on your second choice to see what other side you have to your character.

Triangle Convergent Thinker

A Triangle is goal oriented. A Triangle enjoys planning something out and then doing it. Triangles are motivated by the accomplishment. Triangles tend to look at big long-term issues, but might forget the details. When given a task a triangle will set a goal and work on a plan for it.

A Triangle needs to see a goal and needs to see some accomplishments. Triangles appreciate having a chart of steps to follow. Triangles will take great pleasure in checking off each item that gets done. It should always be clear what the underlying intention is. If the direction is agreed upon, the Triangle can be quite flexible in how to get there.

Triangles are convergent thinkers. They are working towards something specific and finite, and they do it in a logical and systematic way. But they might be lacking in personal creativity.

A Triangle might be a good executive, setting goals and making sure they are met.

If Triangle was your first choice, go back and click on your second choice to see another side to your personality.

Circle Divergent Thinker

A CIRCLE is social and communicative. No hard edges. A CIRCLE handles things by talking about them and smoothing things out with everybody. Communication is the first priority, and making sure there is harmony. When given a task circles will talk about it.

The Circle is a divergent thinker. Circles are creative, extroverted, and intuitive. They will reach out to new areas and to other people. But they aren't particularly systematic or dependable.

For any kind of personal relations the Circle will be good. A Circle will be a good personnel person or a receptionist or customer service representative.

Convergent people (squares, rectangles) might be really frustrated that the divergent ones (circles, squiggles) don't seem to be able to get done what they are supposed to, but will do all kinds of other things and not care about deadlines.

The divergent people might find the convergent ones cold and narrow minded, not taking human factors and new possibilities into consideration.

A Circle doesn't need a plan or a system and is probably turned off by one. Circles need to talk about whatever is at hand. You need to be flexible working with circles and dealing with whatever is going on. For Circles getting to an overall harmonious situation is more important than getting techniques done right.

If circle was your first choice go back and click on your second choice to see what other side you have to your character.

Squiggle Divergent Thinker

A Squiggle is off-the-wall and creative. A Squiggle feels best doing new and different things most of the time and gets bored with regularity. When given a task, a Squiggle will come up with bright ideas about it.

A Squiggle is a divergent thinker. Squiggles are creative, extroverted, and intuitive. They will reach out around them into new areas and to other people. But they aren't particularly systematic or dependable.

If anything new is needed a Squiggle is the person for the job: Advertising, problem solving, etc.

The convergent people (square, rectangle, triangle) might be really frustrated that the divergent ones (squiggle, circle) don't seem to be able to get done what they are supposed to, but will do all kinds of other things and not care about deadlines. The divergent people might find the convergent ones cold and narrow minded, not taking human factors and new possibilities into consideration.

A Squiggle must be presented with new and different things. Unexpected angles is what will motivate a squiggle. It is perfectly fine if no kind of technique is recognized and every session is different. With a squiggle you must be flexible enough to jump around a bit and avoid preconceived ideas about where things will end up.

If squiggle was your first choice go back and click on your second choice to see what other side you have to your character.
