

1783

The Society of the Cincinnati was formed in May of 1783 on the banks of the Hudson River by George Washington and his officers. They created the Society as a fraternal charitable and patriotic order whose original goals were to pressure the Continental Congress to provide pay that was overdue, and to perpetuate the bonds of friendship they had formed over eight years of fighting together to create their new country.

As these soldiers prepared to become private citizens again they took the name of the Roman patriot, Lucius Quintus Cincinnatus. In the fifth century B.C., this original citizen-soldier had put down his plow and picked up his sword to lead the army of Rome to victory over the Barbarians. After the victory, Cincinnatus refused all honors and returned to his farm. Our forebears followed his example as they left their homes, families, businesses and farms and fought for their, and our, freedom, and as they established the fundamental principle of civilian rule over the military in their new country.

Today, the Society of the Cincinnati has over 3,600 members, all descendants of the original officers of the continental and French armies and navies, who served under the command of General Washington during the Revolutionary War. The fourteen constituent Societies, those of the thirteen original states and France, form one Society of Friends. The Society of the Cincinnati operates museums and libraries and provides scholarships, grants and awards. Since 1783, we have worked to make all Americans aware of our proud heritage, so that we today, and those of us to come, will continue to preserve and improve our great nation.
