For Executive Functions, Context Matters

We as educators have the power to create a classroom context that supports our students learning – in this case, their executive functions -- and that is often just as important as a student's skill-building. Executive Functions don't exist in a vacuum, context matters. We can support student's internal context (stress and emotions) and external context (environments and relationships). Learn more about what you can do to create the conditions for learning so all students can thrive.

Effective Foundational Skills Instruction

Our students, especially our earliest learners, need strong foundational skills instruction to become skilled readers. During this workshop, we will review the key components of effective Foundational Skills instruction. You will use the Instructional Practice Guide to observe and identify those key components in a sample lesson. You will also have opportunities to collaborate with role-alike peers to discuss the conditions needed at your school/district to bring these components to life for your students.

Intensifying Interventions for Students

Even with well-designed and carefully delivered reading interventions, some students may need more. Please join us to hear about key considerations for adapting interventions for students with intensive needs. We'll explore how addressing the alterable variables of instruction, curriculum, and environment can help accelerate student progress and improve outcomes for students who need more. This workshop will provide resources to help guide the process and time for Q&A.
