NEWSBOYS ARE POOR ORPHANS AND RUNAWAYS

JULY 18, 1899

In 1899, the streets of New York City were filled with the voices of the Newsboys. Back then, newspapers were the only types of media in the city. They were the only ways to get information about what was going on in the world. There were two major newspapers sold, 'The New York World' and 'The New York Journal.' These were owned by the two most powerful men in the city of New York, Joseph Pulitzer and William Randolph Hearst. Newspapers usually were sold a "penny a paper," as they would say.

The Newsboys were made up of mostly poor orphans and runaways. They slept on the streets of New York with no place to go and no families to see. The only way they made money was from selling newspapers throughout the streets of New York. These Newsboys needed to be very persuasive so that they could sell more papers. If they didn't sell enough papers, they would not be able to sell more papers the next day or eat or get any of their important needs for survival.
