Brooke Marchesi, a junior at Monroe Township High School, spent the summer immersed in code, strengthening her interest in computer engineering during the Girls Who Code program at Pfizer Inc.'s headquarters in New York City. In the span of seven weeks, 40 students dove into various STEM (Science, Technology, Engineering and Mathematics) topics, including robotics, web apps, loops, variables, conditionals and functions, according to the Pfizer program. She was able to participate in workshops that were hosted by Pfizer's digital colleagues. During the program, Brooke learned about different computer languages including Python, HTML and JavaScript. The students also use the summer program to build connections and friendships, all while jumpstarting their careers in technology. Brooke said for the final project her team decided on creating a chat box similar to Amazon's Alexa and had their chat box speak with a sarcastic passive voice. Overall, Brooke said the program has been a life-changing experience, meeting brilliant girls from New York and New Jersey. Brooke was one of three from New Jersey to participate.
