

WHAT GOES AROUND COMES AROUND: IS 2010S FASHION REALLY BACK? BY KYLIE STAFFORD

It's 2010. Out with the baggy jeans, in with the skinny jeans. Pair that light wash denim with a flannel and a nice warm beanie. It is the era where hipsters run rampant, and it is hurdling to our present.

It is an ongoing theory that every twenty to thirty years, an era of fashion repeats itself. For example, 2010s fashion takes its inspiration from the 1980s, with its bold statement pieces, yet they are extremely different and set apart from each other. When someone thinks of 1980s fashion, they either think of bright neon and geometric shapes, or streetwear outfits from famous coming-of-age movies such as "Back to The Future" or "The Outsiders."

Then when someone mentions 2010s fashion the immediate thought is either baggy flannels with a beanie, or those hipster or “quirky” Pinterest girl outfits. Only when analyzed the connections become more apparent: oversized varsity jackets are replaced with a baggy cardigan, geometric patterns are replaced with galaxy prints, and the acid wash skinny jeans from the 2010s are just the equivalent of the popular acid wash straight jeans and jean jackets from the 80s. The 2010s jumbled-up fashion is truly the 1980s reimagined, with elements of both 1990s grunge/skater vibes and the 2000s yearning to stand out.

You might be wondering how this means 2010s fashion is coming back, but hold your horses: I am very aware that 2010s fashion is very despised in the fashion community for its randomness, and to some it lacks what makes fashion, fashion, but 2000s fashion went through the exact same criticisms a few years ago but is now being remade into the Y2K era of fashion that is currently storming the fashion world. This Y2K style is a subgenre of alternative fashion and is inspired by the early 2000s fashion with the 90s skater chic, meaning that this Y2K style is a gateway to the 2010s getting its own revamped style. So sooner rather than later don't be surprised if the hipster style makes a comeback because by 2030 the 2010s are going to be back.
