

Orange cauliflower: mild, slightly sweet, nutty and creamy. The name orange cauliflower is a general descriptor used to encompass multiple varieties, including Cheddar, Orange Burst, and Orange Bouquet, and each cultivar will display varying shades of orange depending on growing conditions.

The Cotton Candy grape has about 12 percent more sugar than a regular table grape and almost no tartness. That sweet taste comes from the two plants that make up the hybrid version: Vitis vinifera, which is the most common grapes species you'll find in America, and a Concord-like grape since Concord grapes are known for their flavor, though they're generally used for jams, jellies, and juice.

European, Hothouse, or English cucumbers are also known as “seedless” and even “burpless” cucumbers, and while not truly seedless, the seeds are less mature and more easily digested. In addition, the skin is thinner and the sizing is much more uniform. If you place them side by side with a garden cucumber, you will see a huge difference in the skin and seeds. They are most commonly seen wrapped in plastic as they get dehydrated easily. English cucumbers are grown in a controlled environment: a hothouse or a greenhouse. But don’t think backyard greenhouse, these are commercially grown in large indoor growing facilities.

This type of cucumber is known as a “slicing cucumber” due to the thin skin and immature seeds. Peeling and seeding an English cucumber is not necessary, as with other cucumbers.