Writing Revolution in the Content Areas: Building Science and Social Studies Knowledge Through Writing Grs. K-2 (Teacher Only) IN-PERSON

Sign Up Now

Starting Soon

This course will use principles of the Hochman Method and Writing Revolution to build content knowledge and vocabulary in science and social studies. An integrated approach to literacy and content areas has been supported by research to accelerate learning. This course will be practical in nature, with participants collaborating to identify rich read-alouds and create a portfolio of resources that can be used in Science 21 and BOCES SSELA units.

Participant Outcomes: Participants are expected to actively participate, work collaboratively to create resources aligned with a content area unit, and share resources with the group.

$100 fee for in-service credit. No fee for MA plus 60

Our state standards require students at nearly all grade levels to write across different genres, including narratives, opinions, and persuasive pieces. However, the standards explain how to reach those goals and many teacher preparation programs do not provide research-based instruction in how to teach students to write well. TWR offers a clear, coherent method of instruction for any subject or grade level that turns struggling writers into strong communicators, deepens their understanding of content, and develops their analytical abilities. Colleges and employers value clear and effective writing, but the NAEP found that only about 24% of students in grades 8 and 11 were proficient writers in 2019. Boosting writing skills improves oral communication, analytical skills, and even reading comprehension.

This course will introduce participants to the Hochman Method, an explicit set of sequenced strategies for teaching expository writing that can be integrated into any content area. The strategies are presented to improve the structure, coherence, and clarity of students' writing, beginning at the sentence level. The focus moves to outlines, paragraphs, and compositions. Participants will also learn how to teach note-taking, summarization, and revision. There are opportunities to practice and create activities tailored to your grade level and subject. This course is appropriate for educators in grades 3-12 but is especially suited to teachers (including Special Education and ENL) of English and social studies.

Participant Outcome: Participant feedback and rating survey.
