[Jillian] I learned about the respiratory therapy profession by accident, and that's a common thing that we hear from other respiratory therapists. I was a member of the biology club at L S U S in my last year of of my biology degree. So Doctor Wissing came and he talked about the cardiopulmonary science program here, and it intrigued me enough that I came over and followed him through the medical school for a tour. And that was kind of it. The rest is history. I loved the the program and thought that it was a good fit for me. So I graduated from L S U S and started the cardiopulmonary science program three days later. So I've been a respiratory therapist since 2005. So 15 years in the field. And I love the field of respiratory therapy because it gives me the opportunity to treat patients from birth to death. And I can treat those patients at home. I can treat them in the pulmonary functions laboratory. And that's where I've spent the majority of my time as a respiratory therapist and really enjoyed that. We have opportunities to advance into management roles and leadership roles, and I find that to be very interesting and, very successful from the program.	Woman with straight, dark, shoulder length hair wearing large silver hoop earrings and a white patterned blouse in lobby of School of Health Professions and Sciences Text: Jillian Danzy, M P H, R R T Assistant Professor, Cardiopulmonary Science

[Jillian] I have been a teacher for about the past three years, and the thing that I like most about teaching is I'm always interested in a problem and finding a good solution. And so over the last three years, I have developed my teaching style where I will take feedback from students and kind of redevelop the way that I explain a theory or, an equation to them and, you know, help them to be able to understand it better. I, in my spare time, I enjoy spending time with my family and my children, and I like to cook and watch movies.	Jillian on camera
