

The Truth About Teachers

For decades, students have whispered about one of the greatest mysteries in education:

Where do teachers go after school ends?

You've probably noticed it yourself – once that final bell rings, teachers seem to disappear. You never run into them at the grocery store. You don't see them at the movie theater. They're just... gone. According to student sources (mostly seniors and one suspiciously confident sophomore), the answer is simple but shocking:

Teachers don't sleep. They recharge.

Rumor has it that when the last student leaves, the teachers gather in the staff room, plug themselves into the coffee maker, and quietly refill their "patience batteries." ☕⚡

When asked for comment, Mrs. Northway issued a brief statement:
"Teachers are dedicated professionals who get adequate rest like everyone else."
Did she really say that? Absolutely not, but we wanted to sound dramatic.

Some skeptics argue it's all nonsense — that teachers simply go home, rest, and return like normal human beings. But the believers point to one final, unexplainable fact:

no student has ever seen a teacher yawn

Coincidence? Or confirmation?

And then there's Ms. Moulton —

the ultimate proof.

She's been seen teaching, like a million PE classes, coaching volleyball, and still somehow greeting students the next morning like she just came back from a vacation.

No caffeine spills, no sleepy eyes, no signs of exhaustion.

It's official: Ms. Moulton doesn't get tired —

she just switches to high-performance mode.

Until someone gains access to the mysterious "Staff Lounge After Hours," the truth remains sealed behind a locked door, guarded by an espresso machine... and Ms. Moulton, still wide awake.
