Inconsistent policy enforcement is undermining school rules

Staff members are not uniformly enforcing policies on uniforms, gum chewing, beverages, eating in classrooms, phone use, and study hall behavior—leading to frustration among those who do enforce and giving students justification to push back ("so-and-so lets us").

Student supervision and movement lack proper coordination

Students are being sent to the media center or other classrooms without passes, prior notice, or adequate supervision, resulting in disruptions, unsanctioned activities, and confusion among staff.

Communication with families and among staff needs improvement

Issues include last-minute field trip notifications to teachers, parents texting students during school hours, and a need for more proactive outreach to families about recurring concerns like excessive bathroom use.

Administration needs to prioritize more transparent and timely communication so the community understands not just what we decide but why.
