Unity, Peace, and Tranquility

When you make a new piece, such as a drawing or music or dance, you must string together completely different elements and individual things to form a united, single piece. These different elements must work together to make something great. The same could be said for America - different cultures, races, genders, etc. coexist and support each other to form the United States. This forms a great tapestry - each individual and unique thread is helping to hold together the whole piece.

However, America doesn't seem to be holding its tapestry together - these individual threads are coming loose, breaking apart, fighting against each other, forming a messy, broken, and weak piece. The ending result looks like an unfinished beginner's work; There are strong parts, but weak links, the ends loose and looking incomplete. Compared to other nations' vivid, complete, strong tapestries, the United States is smaller and weaker. To make our nation better, we must have peace, we must work together, we must each support one another's threads.

In Martin Luther King's 'I have a Dream' speech, there is a section of it where he talks about unity and peace. He says, "I have a dream that one day on the red hills of Georgia, the sons of former slaves and the sons of former slave owners will be able to sit down together at the table of brotherhood." He uses the metaphor, table of brotherhood, to convey that he wishes to see people of different colors and races, united together, supporting each other. Martin Luther King is an example of a strong patch in the United State's piece. If everyone were to support his ideals, support one another no matter the difference, then America would have a great, strong and beautiful tapestry, the colors diverse and unique, but coming together to form the greatest piece humankind has ever seen.
