FROM THE EDITOR

Students have returned to the art studios with fresh energy this trimester, and there is so much good work to share. Jen Brittingham's engineering classes are showcasing a range of inventive projects, while Kelli's advanced photography students spent part of their break creating pieces that explore the theme of gratitude. In painting and drawing, students are developing works that combine traditional drawing with wire sculpture—look for these in our January issue.

We also love hearing from our alumni: Katie Wagner '24 recently reached out with examples of the work she's creating at La Salle University as part of her communications and advertising major.

Finally, a heartfelt thank you to Home and School, whose support funded four new frames that will showcase student artwork and join Solebury's permanent collection.

The Advanced Digital students were asked to take some time for reflection over their Thanksgiving break and work on a photo essay that illustrates aspects of their lives they are most grateful for. It could be an object, an experience, an animal they love, or a pastime, anything that made them feel grateful and appreciate their 'one wild and precious life'. They shared some interesting images and were all the more aware of the beauty around them.

Katie Wagner '24

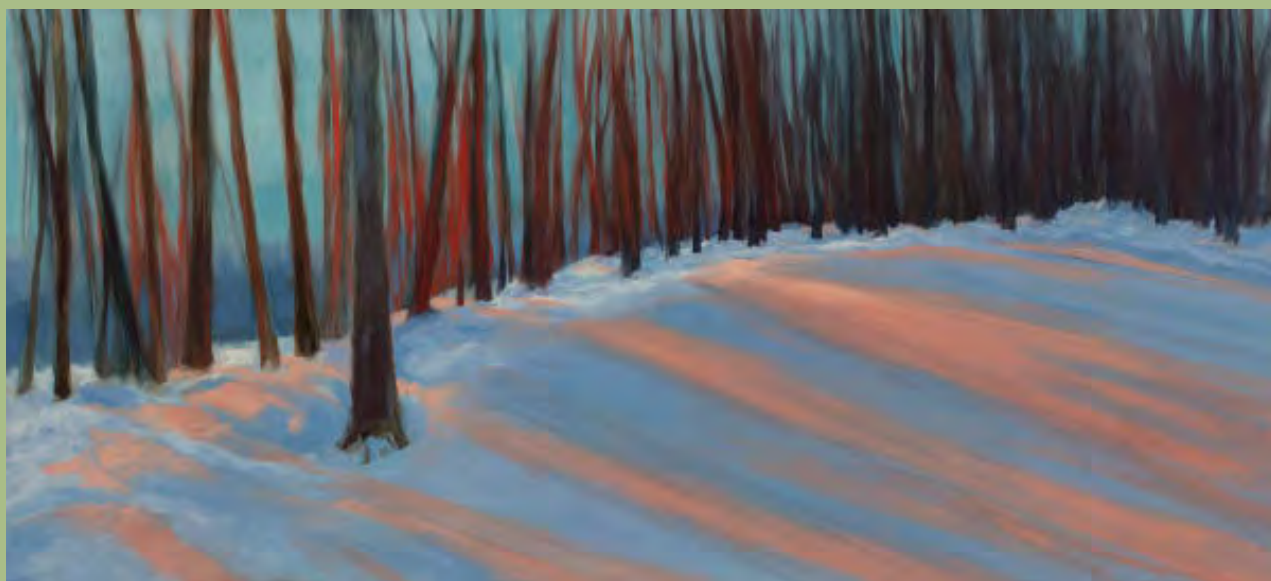

“To complete this project, I researched the Urban Outfitters and Free People brand identities across Pinterest, the official UO website, and a range of current marketing channels including social media, email, and SMS. I approached the work through the lens of an art director, “sourcing” visual and styling inspiration from niche online creators and examining how digital aesthetics emerge and circulate within internet subcultures.

I experimented with digital art effects and visual treatments that aligned with the campaign’s core concept. The final board was built in Canva. I also drew from trending audio/visual patterns across TikTok, Instagram, and Pinterest, using engagement metrics to guide my creative decisions.

If you have any questions about my process, please feel free to reach out! This project has helped me understand my passion for branding, collaborating with independent artists, and supporting ethical, scalable creative strategy.”
