

How Will You Spend Spring Break?

MATHEW DELANO

Spring break is always a milestone in the school year. It is the point where you tell yourself “I finally made it through the hard part of the year.” However, immediately after spring break you are hit with 3 tests and a group project because Mr Humbird is desperately trying to catch up with the other English literature class. Or maybe you are unlucky enough to have a Spring Break Project, where instead of going on vacation or visiting family you are stuck at home worrying about piece wise functions and cellular respiration.

At Grant Union we are not so cruel as to have your spring break be an excuse to have you do homework. You are supposed to enjoy yourself over spring break, it is down time from the constant grueling grind of analyzing symbolic metaphors or determining mutations in DNA. It is time to stop worrying about if Mr Drew is going to ask you what kind of chicken wing is your favorite or if he's going to ask you the significance of quadratic functions in everyday life. It is a time without school, and even though we at GU try our best to make daily life at school as non-stressful as possible, we understand that school just gets tiresome after a while.

So please, go to the coast, or go camping, or play board games with your friends, or maybe just watch movies and play video games all day, it doesn't matter what you end up doing as long as you are making memories, and NOT binge watching all of Breaking Bad for the quintillionth time.

And for Mrs Wilson, her schedule won't change very much because she uses chatGPT to do most of her job anyway.

Personally, I think that the staff should have a week-long trip to Honolulu, preferably in a place without any meddling kids. No matter how you want to spend your spring break we wish you well and congratulations for surviving the first three Quarters.

HAVE A HAPPY SPRING BREAK!
