I cannot believe it's been 13 years since I graduated from Woodland, but I still reflect on my experience often and fondly.

One of the most impactful skills I learned at Woodland was public speaking. Between morning assembly, class performances, and in-class presentations, I became comfortable early on sharing my ideas to a room full of people. I don't get nervous now speaking up in meetings or raising my hand in class while some of my peers hesitate to share because they haven't strengthened their public speaking muscle.

I also learned to embrace my interests because of the support I had from Woodland faculty. One key memory of this is from middle school when Coach Schneider encouraged me to play on the boys flag football team rather than helping on the sideline. I ended up being one of three girls in my grade who played and it continues to be one of my best fun facts.

As an adult, I've continued to stick to my values and passions. From Georgetown, I pursued my dream career in the entertainment industry. I applied to business school as an unorthodox candidate and was accepted into the Kellogg School of Management at Northwestern University with a significant merit scholarship. Here, I was recently chosen to be Co-President of Kellogg's Women's Business Association, the largest club on campus. I was told I got the role because of my passion and desire to be a vocal advocate, traits that first flourished at Woodland.
