Understanding ORF: Using Fluency Data to Inform Instruction Across Grades

Oral Reading Fluency (ORF) is often viewed as a measure of reading speed, but fluency data can provide much deeper insight into student reading development. When interpreted thoughtfully, ORF data can help educators distinguish between challenges related to accuracy, automaticity, and reading efficiency, providing valuable information about the skills that support successful reading.

In this session, participants will explore what fluency is, what ORF reveals about student reading performance, and how ORF fits within the developmental continuum of reading. Through the examination of different fluency profiles, participants will learn how fluency data can support more informed instructional decisions across grade levels.

Participants will:

- Understand what ORF measures and why it matters.
- Interpret ORF data beyond words per minute.
- Use ORF data to inform instructional decisions across the reading continuum.

Lunch will be provided by Pearson. The Lunch & Learn will take place in-person at the Instructional Support Center located at 750 Waverly Avenue, Holtsville, NY 11742

Two Areas of Frustration. One Session.

Student Registration-Sound Familiar?

- Program lotteries for UPK, CTE and magnet seats still run on spreadsheet and email-when the law demands a defensible, fidelity-run process.
- Your Student Information System stores the record. It doesn't run the registration process-the right platform does.

Staff Evaluations-Sound Familiar?

- Too many observations for your strongest educators. Too few for the ones who need help.
- Our Staff Evaluation tool can be used to evaluate non-educators also, since many of those can also have an effect on school culture and the experience for students.
- 3012-e is coming-districts moving now get principal time back and richer performance data.
- One platform. Every employee. 3012-e becomes an early advantage instead of a compliance deadline.
