Director's Note

Beauty and the Beast has enchanted all people of all ages long before the well known Disney film in 1991. Based on the traditional fairytale La Belle et la Bête, the first English translation was published in 1757. It has spawned numerous retellings and reinventions over time. What has made this “a tale as old as time” is not merely its literal longevity but its ability to “speak from the heart.”

The numerous morals are evident and classic: “Do not judge a book by its cover;” and “true beauty comes from within.” Undoubtedly, these are valuable lessons for our students in a culture obsessed with shunning those that are different or those deemed weaker for lacking whichever flavor of coolness is in season at the time. We have all seen the recent bullying headlines and the cost of such intolerance. The mob mentality that mocks Belle at the onset of our show and hunts our Beast at the end is very much present in our own society today.

However, what makes this tale most poignant is that amidst our central character's external conflict, her internal conflict is revealed. The very prejudice she eventually decries is the very one she engages in at first. The small-mindedness that ostracizes her in the village is the very same one that socializes her to utter the word “monster” to our Beast.

Our students often ace a similar situation. Socialized by numerous agents over time, they are sometimes scared to question, scared to doubt, and scared to learn. They feel doubting or questioning is rooted in weakness rather than in strength. Instead they become part of the mob for fear of being ostracized. Belle could have made the same choice. But she did not. And that is her legacy. It is about finding “you can change and learning you can be wrong.” It is her redemptive nature that gives us hope that we can become our own fairytale of sorts. We do not need to become a prince or princess and wear a yellow dress; we just need to continue to learn, grow, and evolve discovering who we truly are within. And that will be our happily ever after.

and to all friends, family and companies that gave us a donation after this note was posted.

Your contribution makes it possible for the team to pay for the equipment bag fees and other miscellaneous expenses, such as the bus and gasoline expense incurred to transport the players to and from the hotel and the ball parks. I would also like to thank the Stepinac staff for all of your assistance in this great project.

Once again thank you from the #1 fan of the Stepinac varsity Baseball Team.
